CHARLTON COMICS GIVE YOU MORE!

"My sister's boy, Lewis Anderdson, became engaged," explained Detective Al Norton to his buddy, Detective Ben Egan. "So she decided to give a party. We were invited and that started everything, because my wife informed me she would need a lot of new clothes. I tried to get some estimate but I just couldn't pinpoint her. It included at least a new pair of shoes, a new dress, a new hat, and a new coat. And a gentle hint that she needed some jewelry as accessories. All this because my nephew decides he is in love and gives his girl a ring. What has this got to do with my wife's idea she didn't have a thing to wear?

I tried to tell her she had five pairs of shoes. Just like speaking to somebody who can't hear a word. I even opened the closet door and here I showed her at least nine dresses. Three coats, mind you that she got last year. Just like wasting my time and good energy. My wife is a determined woman. Either I can give her a check and she will spend it, or she will have everything sent C.O.D. I wanted an estimate. She got mad. I like peace so that was the end of that idea.

Anyway she went out shopping. What a dent it made in my bank account. We had a good time. My sister certainly knew how to be a fine hostess. Smart woman she is. She borrowed her neighbor's maid and the superintendent's wife. Dressed them up in those white outfits. Everything went swell. By that I mean my wife felt that her new outfit got the proper attention."

The phone rang and Detective Ben Egan answered it. No need to listen any more about that engagement party.

"Chief Edward Mirkus wants us in his office at once. Says he has a surprise for us. An old friend of ours is in to pay a visit, and tell us something new. Come on! We can't keep the chief waiting."

The police chief was proud of the two members of his Special Squad. They could handle anything from the ordinary routine matters to the toughest assignment. The door to his office was open and they walked in. Next to the chief's desk, a tall husky dark haired man was seated.

"Sam Perkins in the flesh," greeted Detective Al Norton. "What a good sight for my eyes. Where have you been keeping yourself since you quit the force? Last we heard about you was that you were with a private detective agency up north."

Sam Perkins smiled and shook hands with his two friends. He had a lot of news to tell them.

"I was with the Danton Detective Agency for three years," he began. "Then I got a big break. The Whitemore Department Store people put me in charge of setting up and supervising their private detectives that they use in each store. Pilferage by insiders and shoplifting by outsiders is an expensive headache for retailers. It is estimated that such losses total $100,000,000 annually. Just now I am here in the city. We are setting up something entirely new in catching these thieves. The most efficient and tireless guardians you have ever seen."

"Got some kind of a robot that looks with invisible rays and sees everything?" kidded Detective Al Norton.

"Exactly," snapped back Sam Perkins. "Actually it consists of a closed-circuit television hook-up. On the main floor of our department store in this city we have fourteen cameras. The camera is installed in a semi-concealed position on the mezzanine. It flashes pictures on a screen in our security office. As soon as the camera spots a likely suspect, an officer presses buttons on a control panel to bring the suspect into close-up focus. Then he phones a store detective on the first floor and directs him to the trouble spot. This takes a minute. In our store here we have something new to try out. Each one of our store guards is equipped with a wrist radio. That means that in five seconds he can be after the suspect."

"This we have to see," admitted Detective Al Norton. "The day that you catch a crook by television."

"So you two go with Sam Perkins and watch it being done," interrupted Chief Edward Mirkus. "Let's face the facts and the future. The day of scientific catching of criminals is here. Go and watch it being done. You can learn something."

The two detectives and their friend left the office. Sam Perkins had come in his own car to police headquarters. So Al Norton and Ben Egan followed him to the department store in their squad car. They parked their car in the private parking space of the department store and went up to the security control room. A man was watching a large television screen.

"Frank Winson I want you to meet the two best detectives on the force. They helped me when I was a rookie. Show them how it works."

"Sit down on those chairs and you will get a good view of the screen. I have to keep my attention on it every second. So you fellows just forgive me if I don't turn around. Look up overhead and you see a reflecting mirror. I see you fellows in it," explained Frank Winson. "Nothing may happen at all. Who can tell?"

For half an hour they watched the large screen. Suddenly the trained eye of Frank Winson spotted something. He pushed a button and the screen became gigantic. They were watching a woman at the compact counter. She swept a compact into her left hand. Frank Winson pressed another button and spoke into a small microphone.

"Alex, there is a woman at the compact counter. She is wearing a blue dress. With red dots on it. Spot her?"

"Yes, came back the voice of Alex Chambers, one of the store guards. "What do you want me to do, Mr. Winson?"

"You and Ted follow her. Don't make any arrest until she leaves the builidng and is outside. Follow orders."

Al Norton and Ben Egan watched the woman walk slowly through the store. She left by a side door. A few minutes later she returned flanked by a guard on each side. She was brought to another room. This was the interrogation room. A special hook-up showed what was taking place. The woman was questioned. She admitted stealing the compact. She produced it. Then she made a written statement. Police headquarters were notified and an officer came. The statement was given to the officer and she realized she was under arrest. She cried bitterly.

At lunch time Sam Perkins took his two guests to the store's restaurant for lunch. He told them one important fact.

"We prosecute every case now. That's the only way to wipe out shoplifting. After lunch you can watch for another half hour and then call it quits."

They all went back to the room and kept their eyes on the screen. Frank Winson was watching a man with a large brown hat walking along the aisles.

"That Moe Seliger," said Detective Ben Egan. "He considers himself one of the best pickpockets."

"There he goes into action," half shouted Frank Winson. "He's taking a wallet from the pocket of the man in the blue suit." Again the screen became gigantic. Frank Winson spoke into the small microphone.

"Bring the man with the large brown hat up here, Dave. And Bob, tell the man with the blue suit his pocket has just been picked. Bring them both up here."

The two detectives knew there would be excitement. The man in the blue suit was totally surprised. Sure, his pocket had been picked. Moe Seliger was calm.

"You fellows can search me. You find no wallet. I then sue for false arrest, and also a slander on my character."

A search produced no wallet but a lot of bills. A third guard entered and produced the wallet.

"You threw that wallet away in a fraction of a second," challenged Detective Ben Egan. "We all saw you take the wallet out of this man's pocket."

"Got to say you have nerve," replied Moe Seliger. "I want you to tell me how you can prove to a jury I took a wallet I haven't got."

"Easy," smiled Sam Perkins. "And I want to tell you, Ben and Al, I have been holding a secret from you. Watch now for the final touch."

A small screen was brought into the room. A camera was trained upon the screen, and Moe Seliger watched himself in action! They had taken a kinescope at the same time.

The expression of his face showed he was totally bewildered. He counted off some bills and offered them to the man he had just robbed.

"I admit it," he finally said. "You want a written statement? Sure. I'll make it. When you detectives think up things like this, it's time for a crook like me to quit. You can't beat science."

Then he turned to Detective Ben Egan.

"So they will send me away again. The fellows won't believe this story. What am I going to tell them?"

"That it never pays to be dishonest," snapped back Detective Al Norton.
